Tips for Keeping Your Hard-working Cat Happy and Healthy

- 1) Help your cat acclimate before releasing them! Provide a safe, enclosed place for kitty to live in for the first one to two weeks. If you let kitty go right away, he/she may run away and not come back. You can use a large dog crate in a quiet area, utilize an existing animal holding pen, or set them up in a tack room or loft space. Simply make sure the space is 100% secure with no openings for kitty to escape. Choose a quiet place, away from loud machinery, dogs or high traffic. Try to choose the same location where you will feed and water the cat going forward. This space should be inside your barn or outbuilding, and safe from the elements.
- 2) Provide a litter box, bed, hiding place, and fresh food and water daily. This will help your cat learn that their needs will be met in this space. They will learn where “home base” is, and will be more likely to return here once released.
- 3) After one to two weeks, simply open the door to their enclosure and walk away.
- 4) Your cat still depends on you for basic care. Studies show that cats that are fed regularly are better mousers because they have better overall health and energy. Therefore, the cats should have access to safe and adequate shelter, a dry bed, dry food and fresh water.
- 5) Keep your cat current on their vaccines to prevent illness and infection.
